The basic faith of those who believe in democracy is that the common man has enough goodwill and common sense to govern well, that would give them freedom and power. Men will educate one another, will introduce better ways of and habit of friendly co-operation and will in the long run create a new society which will give the best possible opportunity of good life to all. A believer in democracy has faith in human nature, in the goodwill and political ability of the common man. But, uneducated people with no experience of self-government are quite incapable of suddenly making a success of democracy. History shows that subtle democracy is a slow growth. The people must have a long experience of self-government and responsibility in many walks of life. They learn the qualities of tolerance, co-operation and judgement which are essential to be a good citizen of a democracy.
